Background

Physical inactivity is a significant public health concern globally, associated with an increased risk of chronic diseases and detrimental effects on both physical and mental health. Technologically based interventions have emerged as a potential solution to promote physical activity engagement and improve mental health outcomes. However, understanding the effectiveness of these interventions and the role of gender in their outcomes is essential for developing tailored strategies.

Objective

This study aims to examine the effectiveness of technologically based interventions in promoting physical activity and improving mental health outcomes, with a specific focus on gender differences.

Abstract

Chatbots without artificial intelligence can play the role of practical and easy-to-implement learning objects in e-learning environments, allowing a reduction in social or psychological isolation. This research, with a sample of 79 students, explores the principles that need to be followed in designing this kind of chatbot in education in order to ensure an acceptable outcome for students. Research has shown that students interacting with a chatbot without artificial intelligence expect similar psychological and communicative responses to those of a live human, project the characteristics of the chatbot from the dialogue, and are taken aback when the chatbot does not understand or cannot help them sufficiently. The study is based on a design through research approach, in which students in information studies and library science interacted with a specific chatbot focused on information retrieval, and recorded their experiences and feelings in an online questionnaire. The study intends to find principles for the design of chatbots without artificial intelligence so that students feel comfortable interacting with them.

1. Introduction

The COVID-19 pandemic has helped to identify many distance education problems [1,2]. In agreement with other researchers, Adnan and Anwar [3] argue that students find it difficult to motivate themselves in online learning, they lack human contact, and that face-to-face interaction is essential to their learning. Bao [4], in one of the earliest studies, emphasised the importance of social connection and social interaction for learning. Thus, education stands at a crossroads where, on the one hand, there are legitimate demands for the development of online learning activities and programs [5,6], and, on the other hand, there are significant psychological [3,7] or psychosocial factors [8] that hinder students from making their learning sufficiently enjoyable and of high quality.

Online education is thus becoming both a challenge and a danger, facing the question of how to ensure the availability of quality education through digital technologies while supporting the social dimension of education, which is not to be neglected. There are several ways to tackle this challenge. The use of blended learning, which combines online and face-to-face learning, is offered [9,10]—the advantage of this is social interaction. The problem is that it requires people to come together, can lead to limiting the target group's education, for example, geographically or socially. A combination of online and physical learning, offered by hybrid learning models [11], which are suitable for situations in which physical learning forms a substantial part of education and online
