Dear Ms. Watson,

Thank you for the email about our manuscript.

Our manuscript is the following study from another publication you have mentioned. The other study you have mentioned was conducted before our manuscript (first study). Therefore, we develop and add another variable considering academic cyberslacking. I will name the previous study the first study, and our manuscript is the second one.

Here are some main differences and highlights between those two studies :

1. The independent variables in the first study were only two variables: self-regulated learning (SRL) and media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE). The second study (our manuscript) investigated four variables: media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE), self-regulation (not SRL), social media engagement, and ARCS motivation. We also explored social media engagement as a mediating variable related to academic cyberslacking.
2. The number of subjects in the first study are 423 subjects with students from the Faculty of Medicine, Nursing, Pharmacology, and Psychology. The second study investigated 1489 subjects from the Faculty of Business, Psychology, Communications Science, Teacher Training and Education Science, Engineering, Medicine, and Nursing. The subjects between those two studies are entirely different students, and more faculties are involved in the second study.
3. Data were analyzed using regression analysis with SPSS software. Meanwhile, the data in the second study were analyzed using Structural Equation Model (SEM) with model fit results and using LISRELL software.
4. The first study proved that only SRL, which predicts academic cyberslacking and media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE) did not correlate with academic cyberslacking. The second study with different subjects proved that media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE) and Social Media Engagement (SME) predict academic cyberslacking.

I hope our explanations are clear to highlight the differences between those two studies.

Thank you very much for your understanding.

Please do not hesitate to contact us about our manuscript.

Sincerely yours,
Ermida Simanjuntak

Dear Ms. Watson,

Thank you for the email. We are sorry that we miss explaining the study in scitepress 2018 about cyberslacking. The publication in the scitepress is preliminary research about academic cyberslacking before we conducted our first study. We presented our survey research about academic cyberslacking at the ICP-HESOS 2018 (International Conference on Psychology in Health, Educational, Social, and Organizational Settings) conducted at Airlangga University - Indonesia and our paper was selected to be part of the conference proceedings. However, the proceeding publication process took very long, so the publication in scitepress was released in 2020 after our publication in Behaviour Sciences (2019) as our first study.

We will explain the difference between the scitepress publication and our manuscript :

1. The independent variables in scitepress include three independent variables: Internet habit strength (IHS), media multitasking self-efficacy (MME), and self-regulated learning (SRL). Our manuscript explored four variables: media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE), self-regulation (not SRL), social media engagement, and ARCS motivation. We include social media engagement (SME) as a mediating variable. Our manuscript did not investigate Internet habit strength (IHS) and self-regulated learning (SRL) like in the scitepress. We do not investigate self-regulated learning (SRL) in our manuscript, but we explored self-regulation.
2. The number of subjects in the scitepress study is 385 subjects with students from the Faculty of Psychology, Pharmacy, Nursing, Medicine, and Philosophy. Our manuscript examines 1489 subjects from the Faculty of Business, Psychology, Communications Science, Teacher Training and Education Science, Engineering, Medicine, and Nursing. The subjects are all new people in those two studies, so the subjects are totally different people.
3. The publication in scitepress uses SPSS software with regression analysis, and our manuscript uses Structural Equation Model (SEM) to analyze the data (using LISRELL software).
4. The scitepress publication proved that internet habit strength (IHS) and media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE) predict academic cyberslacking. Our manuscript proved that only media multitasking self-efficacy (MMSE) and Social Media Engagement (SME) predict academic cyberslacking.
5. SRL as a variable in scitepress was measured using SRL scale based on research from Kadioglu, Uzuntiryaki, and Aydin (2011). We measured the self-regulation in our manuscript using self-regulation scale from Schwarzer, et al (1999).

Thank you very much for your consideration of our manuscript.

Sincerely yours,
Ermida Simanjuntak

Dear Ms. Watson,

Thank you for the feedback on our manuscript. We will cite our previous publications in our manuscript as we may miss putting our previous publications.

Regarding the informed consent from parents, we consider our subjects to be young adults because they are university students. Seventeen years may not be exactly seventeen years. The university learning year starts in the middle of the year, so 17 years old students will reach 18 years old soon, and they are considered as young adults in the Indonesian context. Another reason is that our subjects are not patients because we did not conduct our research in clinical settings but in university classrooms. Our manuscript topic is about the students' learning process, and we did not give any treatments or clinical treatments to the subjects. All of our subjects filed informed consent before filling out the questionnaire, and they may decline to participate in the survey if they are not interested after hearing our explanation about the survey. The data are also anonymized, and the committee of ethics has proved our research plan. However, we added in the manuscript the informed consent of the participants as you have requested.

We will revise our manuscript revision and resubmit it to the journal website.

Thank you for your kind consideration of our manuscript.

Sincerely yours,
Ermida Simanjuntak
